- Donald Trump has said that his favourite word is tariff, which he describes as “the most beautiful word in the dictionary”. So his announcement on Monday that he would be imposing 25% tariffs on imports from China, Mexico and Canada was perhaps to be expected. He also separately outlined “an additional 10% tariff” on imports from China, which – even if enacted – would be well below the 60% rate that Trump had threatened on the campaign trail. More surprising is the US president-elect’s claim that the tariffs are a response to China’s failure to curb the flow of fentanyl into the US.
- “I have had many talks with China about the massive amounts of drugs, in particular fentanyl, being sent into the United States – but to no avail,” Trump wrote. “Representatives of China told me that they would institute their maximum penalty, that of death, for any drug dealers caught doing this but, unfortunately, they never followed through, and drugs are pouring into our country, mostly through Mexico, at levels never seen before. Until such time as they stop, we will be charging China an additional 10% tariff”.
- China has disputed this characterisation of the flow of deadly synthetic opioids into the US. On Tuesday, a Chinese foreign ministry spokesperson said: “China is one of the world’s toughest countries on counternarcotics both in terms of policy and its implementation. Fentanyl is an issue for the US. In the spirit of humanity, China has given support to the US’s response to this issue.”
- Fentanyl is a synthetic opioid that is far more powerful than heroin. Although it has legitimate medical uses for pain management, last year, nearly 75,000 people in the US died from a fentanyl overdose. Vanda Felbab-Brown, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, has said that the crisis is the “most lethal drug epidemic ever in human history”.
- Fentanyl started arriving in the US from China about 10 years ago. As authorities in the US and China have cracked down on traffickers and criminal gangs, much of that flow has been re-routed through cartels in Mexico. Rather than sending shipments of finished illicit fentanyl directly to the US, drug traffickers and exporters in China send precursor chemicals to Mexico, where they can be turned into fentanyl and sent on to the US. The 2010s were a bright spot for US-China cooperation on fentanyl. But in 2022, when the then speaker of the House of Representatives Nancy Pelosi visited Taiwan, Beijing responded angrily by cutting off several channels of communication with the US, including counternarcotics co-operation. It was only last year, when Joe Biden and Xi Jinping met in San Francisco, that bilateral talks on fentanyl were re-opened. China and the US have also agreed to co-operate on tackling money laundering. Chinese and Mexican organised criminal gangs form the financial backbone of the international fentanyl trade.
- But China insists that the fentanyl crisis is, at its heart, a problem of the US’s own making. “The root cause of the overdose lies in the US itself, China’s foreign ministry spokesperson, Mao Ning, said last month. (514 words)
