

No other country puts as much emphasis (n'attache autant d'importance) on "freedom" as the United States. Patrick Henry demanded "liberty or death". The national anthem (hymne) calls America "the land of the free". Great reformers from Abraham Lincoln to Martin Luther King have urged America to live up to (être fidèle à) its ideal of "freedom". When a group of French Americanophiles wanted to flatter the United States, they sent the Statue of Liberty. And no other country boasts (se vanter) as much about its mission to give freedom to the rest of the world.

Habeas corpus (a Latin phrase meaning "You shall have your body") emerged in English law first with Magna Carta (1215) and expresses the notion that every citizen is protected against arbitrary imprisonment. More precisely, it is an order (ordonnance) issued by a court to the authorities detaining someone to produce the detainee so that the legality of his detention can be established: no-one can be detained without being charged (être inculpé). This essential right was enshrined in the Habeas Corpus Act of 1679.

Britain's Home Secretary first raised the notion of an identity-card scheme shortly after the terrorist attacks in New York City in 2001. Unlike French people, the British have never had identity cards and many see them as "intrusive" (indiscret). However the government vindicated (a défendu) its scheme (projet) by saying it was an indispensable tool in the fight against not only terrorism but also illegal immigration, crime, identity theft and benefit fraud (fraude du système d'allocations). In the face of continuing opposition from the other two main parties and a large section of the public, however, the government finally decided not to force British nationals to carry them.

The American Civil Liberties Union (or ACLU) is a lobbying organization whose objective is to "defend and preserve the individual rights and liberties guaranteed to every person in this country by the Constitution and laws of the United States". It has been influential in the promotion (défense) of religious liberty, separation of church and state, free speech, reproductive rights (access to contraception and abortion), civil rights for LGBT people, the right to privacy as well as the abolition of capital punishment and the decriminalization of drugs.

On this year's Sept. 17 Constitution Day, the U.S. Constitution marked its 230th anniversary at a time of intense debate about the meaning of the First Amendment. On campuses and in cities across America, online and in the workplace, there are calls to balance the First Amendment's protections for hate speech against other values, such as dignity or avoiding emotional injury. In the courts, however, there is no similar debate about the meaning of the First Amendment. On all sides of the spectrum, justices and judges agree that hate speech must be protected in America unless it is intended to and likely to cause imminent violence.

If America is to remain free, it is essential for us to protect even hateful speech from those who would censor or silence it. This freedom—with the other First Amendment freedoms of conscience and assembly—is part of the bedrock (base) of American liberty.

In a sense, this is a golden age for free speech. Your smartphone can call up newspapers from the other side of world in seconds... Anyone with access to the internet can be a publisher, and anyone who can reach Wikipedia enters a digital haven where America's First Amendment reigns. However, watchdogs report that speaking out (dire ce que l'on pense) is becoming more dangerous. Free speech is under attack in three ways. First, repression by governments has increased... Second, a worrying number of non-state actors are enforcing censorship by assassination. Reporters in Mexico who investigate crime or corruption are often murdered... Jihadists slaughter those they think have insulted their faith... Third, the idea has spread that people and groups have a right not to be offended. This may sound innocuous (inoffensif). But if I have a right not to be offended, that means someone must police what you say about me, or about the things I hold dear, such as my ethnic group, religion, or even political beliefs. Since offence is subjective, the power to police it is both vast and arbitrary.
